Starter Hatch Explains.

Allen's Mills, Me., Sept. 27, 1895.

EDITOR ADVERTISER.—Dear Sir: It is usually of little avail to notice adverse criticism and I think in my limited experience as starting judge I have never made answer to anything of an unfavorable nature before.

In your paper you say "the first official act of the judges was to exclude reporters from the judges' stand." The facts are I informed W. S. Starbird, superintendent, of the new rule whereby any association which allows persons other than judges, timers and clerk, is liable to a fine of $100. Mr. Starbird said he did not personally care to stay in the stand with the liability of fine in view and asked outsiders to go down. In regard to Mr. Thompson's "complaint" I know nothing. A man who protests a horse comes to the stand, makes his charges and reduces them to writing before the close of the meeting, and then has a sufficient time to prove his charges, during which time the winnings are withheld. There was no protest put in and so the judges had no decision to make in the matter. There may have been outside talk about the matter of Warwick's eligibility but the horse had previously competed in races on other tracks. In the absence of any proof the supposition was that he was eligible. Very truly yours,

G. M. HATCH.

(Mr. Hatch's explanation that the exclusion of reporters from the judges' stand was in consequence of a new rule of the National Trotting Association. The master of Mr. Thompson's complaint is explained as the distinction between finding fault and making a formal protest. Eo.)

The Lillian Russell cigar draws fine.

COINCIDENCE OR WHAT?

By ALICE E. EVES.

(Copyright, 1893, by the Author.)

"For more intellect than heart; dependent upon it, the mentally gifted woman is necessarily wanting in the latter essential."

The elder gentleman gravely shook his head.

"What! You don't believe it?" exclaimed the first speaker, in great surprise. "Why, just consider the facts from a physiological standpoint. The extreme exercise and development of any one faculty must, of a necessity, dwarf the others."

"You forget that some people are so richly endowed with mind and heart that, even granting the mental attributes to be largely dominant, and your theory true, they have still enough heart to furnish forth two or three ordinary individuals. Then, too, quality is as much—yes, more—to be considered than quantity. With a person of refinement all the conditions must be harmonious in another in order to excite even admiration. I should suppose, to such a person, a moderate degree of regard from a refined, noble or thoughtful person would be of more value than the most complete and unwearied devotion of a coarser, more unbecoming nature. If you cannot thoroughly enjoy a thing, what does it matter how much you have of it? For my own private delectation, I would vastly prefer a bowl of honey to a barrel of molasses."

"Oh, pshaw, doctor!" exclaimed the young man rather impatiently. "You don't understand what I mean. But to carry out your illustration, suppose you found, after marriage, that you had only a painted bowl of honey, the mere counterfeit of what might have been, wouldn't you rather, in that case, have a genuine barrel of molasses?"

"Well, I don't know what I should do if I was that kind of a fool."

"Fool or not," said the other rather hotly, "we see that sort of thing every day among people who don't go by that name in the polite world."

"Well, I think if I hadn't discriminated enough to have found out the delusion before it was too late, I shouldn't say anything about it. If I was aesthetically inclined, I might cultivate an admiration for the bowl of honey as a work of art. If I was coarse or had, I might take to the barrel of molasses."

"Now you are only dodging the point. You say what you might do; you do not say how you would feel."

"I admit that I was. When you come down to how I should feel, the subject becomes too tragic for me to handle."

The peculiarly impressive tone in which this was said seemed to pass unnoticed by the young man, for he went on speaking:

"To come back to first principles, I think literary people are unfit for married life. I have always said that if I were a woman, I never would marry a literary man. From Socrates to Carlyle, men of letters have made notoriously bad husbands."

"There is always a great deal to be said on one side of a question till you get to the other side. I suppose one might make out a pretty good list of happy marriages among literary people, and take only the most celebrated ones at that. Of course the lesser light must have the fine patience of devotion, together with the capability of appreciating the greatness of the other. Leaving out such a proviso, one can scarcely conceive of love at all between people so brought together."

There was a long silence, during which the young man leaned his head on his hand and looked out of the window.

As he did so, you could see to good advantage the perfect Greek contour of his features and the wonderful beauty of his eyes.

People who knew him said that it seemed a sort of mistake that he should belong to the legal profession. Assuredly he should have been a poet or painter. It seemed strange that the attorney and Counselor at Law—should have any reference to this man. Anything sternly businesslike in connection with this Attie head seemed as incongruous as expecting a lily to be good for rheumatism.

It was generally conceded that a creature so magnificently classic in face and form should never have done anything else but make love on the stage as Tellus or Troilus, or pose in a pre-Raphaelite studio.

Something so unique unquestionably ought to have had the proper setting. Rayne Carter, if he was conscious of the blameworthy called forth by his unusual physical beauty, like Ulysses, stopped his ears and sailed along, leaving a whirlwind of sighs in his track.

But one fine day the young Athenian stopped to listen and was lost. At least he conceived a more than passing fancy for Marion Jeffreys, a rising young author in magazine literature, and was just now debating whether to sail on or moor his bark forever on the new shores that he had found.

Women, who sometimes believe a man's devotion to be as unquestioning and unconditional as their own, little know how much calm, cool deliberation enters into the matter, and vice versa—the same is true of the other side. Ah, well, if the secret is never known, perhaps the results are just as good.

The gentleman who sat at the left of the table was evidently over 50. His bushy side whiskers, mustache and hair were quite gray.

John G. Merrivale, M. D., was stout, prosperous and every inch the family physician, with a large practice. He was married, but had no children, and Rayne Carter was his favorite and protégé.

The room they sat in was an upper one in the doctor's house—his "den," he called it, because here he read, smoked and enjoyed himself in his own peculiar way.

On this particular summer night there was no light in the apartment except that which came from the moon pouring in a flood of white, light through the open casement.

While the young man continued to look out of the window the manner of the other person became, to say the least, strange.

First he appeared lost in thought, then he raised his eyes, giving a quick, scrutinizing glance at his companion, then he stared in a queer way at the moonlight on the floor, his gaze wandering back in a dazed manner to the young man's face, where it seemed rooted. Once he opened his lips as if to speak, but said nothing.

Carter turned from the window, saying:

"Doctor, I—"

He stopped short, looking at the other man. Something in his face arrested the sentence midway.

At the sound of the young man's voice Dr. Merrivale seemed to come back to his normal condition.

"Was I asleep at any time since I stopped talking?" he asked.

"Not that I know of. It doesn't seem more than two or three minutes since you were speaking."

"Did you turn around or look this way during that time?"

"No, certainly not," said Carter, decidedly mystified.

"Then I wasn't asleep—no, I couldn't have been."

"Doc, what in the world is the matter with you?"

"I don't know—nothing, I guess—but something rather odd happened to me. A minute ago I could have sworn I was in the old room at Heidelberg and you were Phil Morely. You didn't know Phil—no, of course not—but if ever the transmigration of bodies, instead of souls, were possible, you are Philip Morely with, I hope, another soul, but even that is surprisingly like him in some respects. Yes, the moonlight came into the room at just that angle, and out among the trees there was the top of a town looking exactly like that, from the window of the old room where Phil and I were chums 25 years ago. I wonder if I am awake! Phil—I mean Rayne—pinch me, or stop—turn me out a little of that Rhine wine. I want to know whether I'm a ghost or you are."

The young man sprang to his feet and seemed to know where the wine was kept, for he opened a little closet door, and bringing forth a bottle and two glasses, placed them on the table.

"There," he said, handing the clear amber fluid to his friend, "I certainly don't see a spook, or I shouldn't be doing this. If you drink it, you are not a spook. Ergo," as the other gentleman began to sip the wine, "neither of us is a spook. But if you insist on it I'll throw you out of the window or do any little thing in that line to oblige."

"No, I think I won't trouble you," said the doctor. "I believe I'm all right again. Do you believe in mesmerism or clairvoyance, or anything of that sort?"

"I think there is something in it."

"Well, I never had anything to do with it, but if I thought it at all probable that I was a subject for that sort of thing I should say I was transported into the past with a vividness of sensations and surroundings which only dreams or the clairvoyant state can produce. You see, I began thinking of that remark of yours, 'More intellect than heart,' and from that moment I seemed to be in Heidelberg, where those identical words were spoken by a man so exactly like you that you might be he."

"Very strange coincidence. And yet there was more meant than I expressed. I have a strong personal interest in the truth of that assertion."

"So had he, and I knew you had. Let me tell you, my boy, the man who gains the love of Marion Jeffreys is a lucky fellow. I know her."

"Suppose he couldn't tell whether he had gained it?"

"The deuce! Don't be Uriah Heepish!" broke out the doctor testily. "I am certain she loves you."

"Are you?"

"And the young man's eyes glistened with pleasure."

"Yes, and I don't believe you are worthy of her; at least, it strikes me just now that you are not."

There was silence for a few minutes. The doctor seemed to have lapsed again into reverie. Suddenly he looked up and inquired:

"What day is this?"

"The 21st."

"The very day, the very month and the moonlight struck the floor at exactly that angle. How odd are you?"

"Twenty-four."

"Just his age—your double's"—and he sat by the window, 25 years ago to-night, just as you do now."

"Well, my friend, I begin to feel as if I should like to have you explain yourself."

"And so I will—I must, for your sake and hers. I'm like the Ancient Mariner; I should have to tell that story tonight, even if I broke the most solemn vow I ever made."

"This is a confidence I have never betrayed, but it can make no difference now to the ones most concerned, and it may do some good. You never knew the principal reason why I took such a sudden fancy to you. It was because you are the counterpart of my old college chum, Phil Morely, one of the most fascinating men I ever knew."

"Phil and I were at Heidelberg. I was four or five years older than he, and he was only there for a special course, while I was taking a more extended one."

"One day—it was early in April, and unusually warm and pleasant for the season—we were out for a stroll. We walked on and on, till we came to the park leading up to the old castle."

"All at once he stopped and exclaimed, 'Look!'"

"Following the direction of his hand, I saw, some distance above us, a group of two—an elderly gentleman bending over some small object, which he seemed to be carefully examining, and a young girl reaching up to gather some flowers from a projecting ledge."

The soft gray of her dress was brightened by a crimson scarf which she had thrown carelessly around her shoulders with the classic grace of a Reclamer.

"We could not distinguish her face, shaded as it was by her hat; but the exquisite beauty of form and movement as she secured the flowers, fastened them

"I obligingly walked with the professor." In her belt and turned to watch the gentleman was something that held our gaze.

"Jove!" exclaimed Phil, "it is a picture!"

"It is more than a picture," I said.

"It moves."

"I must get nearer, and see if she is as pretty as she is graceful."

"You'd better not," I answered; "you can't expect everything in one woman. You'll be sure to be disappointed by a nearer view. Very probably she's like the Italian women, who, Byron says, are best seen from a balcony."

"Come, at least let us walk that way," he persisted, and so we began to climb.

"When we came up to the place, the lady had wandered some little distance away, but the gentleman approached and addressed us first. He was a stranger, he said, and noticing that we were students concluded that we could give him some information which he wished."

"We declared our willingness to serve him in any way we could, and were delighted at meeting a fellow countryman. The lady seemed rather to keep out of our way, but as we were careful to cultivate the acquaintance of the old gentleman we met her, and were introduced in a few days afterward."

"Phil confessed that he was a little disappointed in her face. She certainly was not beautiful, neither was she plain. Her eyes were marvellously fine, owing to a peculiar, luminous beauty of expression more than to color or form. The other features were decidedly irregular, the complexion clear, with a fresh, healthy tint, and the hair dark brown and abundant."

"We had not been many times in her company before we discovered that she was witty, sympathetic, thoughtful, and, in fact, a very brilliant woman."

"What do you think of her now?" I asked Phil one evening as we entered the little study room, having just come from the professor's lodgings.

NORTH PARIS.

Many from this place attended county fair.

Frank Kimball begins work at camp Klondike, Sept. 26.

H. R. Edgerly, wife and children visited at South Paris during the fair.

R. L. Tyler and sister, Mrs. Robinson, of Roxbury, are stopping at Ed. Richardson's.

Fred Stevens and wife, who have been at work at Livermore Falls, have returned home.

Mrs. America Andrews visited her daughter, Mrs. Charles Edwards, of Paris Hill, last week.

The M. E. society contemplates giving an old folks' concert in the near future. Further notice will be given.

"Uncle" David Young visited at Norway, last week. He took in everything of interest and among the rest the County buildings. He returned none the worse for his journey. Mr. Young will be 94 years of age in November.

NORTH WOODSTOCK.

Helen Doughty is at work for a short time at Henry Howe's, Hanover.

Herman Billings went to Oxford, last week, and took in the county fair.

There was an old fashioned evening party at Geo. Brown's, Saturday evening.

Walter Sessions is attending the fall term of school at Hebron Academy.

Ina Tucker, of Whitman, Mass., was at W. E. Harding's, quite recently, and called on some of her old neighbors.

The citizens of this place have patronized the fairs quite well. Geo. Brown and wife and F. F. Foster and wife attended the State fair.

Cynthia Bisbee of West Sumner passed through this place Sunday. Her brother, Geo. York, has carried her to Hanover to visit her niece, Mrs. Fred Silver.

Emerson Billings has been doing considerable repairing on his house. He has built a piazza, put in new large windows and shingled the roof, newly clapboarded it and painted it white.

Mrs. L. Foss, who has been spending the summer with her sister, Mrs. E. Billings, went to Boston, last week, to visit another sister before returning to her home in Concord, N. H. B. R. Billings accompanied her to Portland.

Geo. Wise and wife of South Paris visited at Fred Bryant's, last Saturday. Mr. Wise returned home, Sunday, while Mrs. Wise and her sister, Mrs. L. Hemingway, will visit friends at Rumford Falls and vicinity, the present week.

Lizzie Millett is at work, labelling, at the corn shop, Bryant's Pond. The sweet corn crop was quite profitable to the farmers, in the excellent yield and the chance to work for many. Geo. Brown hauled some immense loads of corn, two of them cutting 5000 pounds. The last and largest load cut 2550 lbs.

A. H. Sessions and wife have recently received some elegant and useful presents. Among them are a pretty willow rocking chair from A. Hill, Bryant's Pond; a set of silver knives and forks, sugar spoon and butter knife from S. D. Sessions, Providence, R. I.; silver berry spoon from Mrs. Charles Adams; and each of them a napkin ring on which their names, Asa and Stella, are engraved, from Helen Doughty.

GILEAD.

B. F. Hicks' family have moved to their South Paris home.

Mrs. J. W. Bennett has had the pleasure of a visit from her mother and sister from Marquette, Mich.

Rev. F. M. Wiswell of Marlboro, N. H., who preached here several years ago, was in town, recently.

Mrs. F. L. Gardiner and Mrs. George E. Doyle and son from Portland, are spending a few weeks at the tavern.

Mrs. A. H. Lary and little Howard, who have spent the summer at her mother's, have left for their home in Jersey City, N. J.

FOR THE COUNTY FAIR

You will want some extra Groceries. You will find everything you may want in GROCERIES, FRUITS, etc., at our store. We will try and make it for your interest to get your supplies of us.

Next week we shall have an extra good trade in Grapes. Our friends and customers outside of the village are invited to make our store their headquarters while here.

We think we have got an extra good line of things eatable. Come in and see what you think about it.
